Without question, we live in an information age. When applying for credit cards or visiting a doctor, our personal data is from person to person. Unfortunately, that information isn't always safely protected or stored. Identity theft is widespread, as are database thefts. According to one , 822 million personal records were stolen in 2013. That almost doubled the all-time record, which was set in 2011.

Then there's the Internet. E-tailers, social networking sites, and other websites often track our online activity. Google has come under fire more than any other company. Through its search engine, Gmail, and tools like the Google Toolbar, the company can many of your online moves. That includes searches made, websites visited, and items purchased. Critics say this is a serious privacy risk. Google says the data is safe, and the company only uses it to improve our online .

These days, our privacy is even at risk when we go outside. cameras attached to street lamps, traffic lights, and buildings watch our every move. Satellites high above the Earth also look down on us. Supporters of the trend say we live in dangerous times, and surveillance makes us safer. Critics say it chips away at our freedom. Whoever's right, the video surveillance is red hot, worth an estimated $14 billion in 2013.

When we travel at home or abroad, our privacy is also . Cell phones can be tracked, letting people with the right equipment know our location. ID cards and passports are starting to use computer chips that store personal information. Also, more countries are taking people's fingerprints and photographs when they at airports. Again, that's done for security reasons.

As our privacy disappears bit by bit, some people are trying to live as simply as possible. By offline and limiting the flow of personal data, they are trying to “fly under the radar.” Others are embracing the situation. They accept that they are “public figures” and look for ways to turn it to their 30. To millions of bloggers and other online celebrities, the idea of privacy is a thing of the past.
